Being the family member of a person with hoarding disorder (HD) can be very stressful. For those family members who live with the person with Hoarding Disorder, such as a partner, child, sibling or dependent parent, living among the extreme clutter can cause a lot of physical and emotional difficulties. These same difficulties can also be present for family members who do not live with the person with HD, and all families affected by HD may experience friction and tension as a result.

Young Children

Children of those with HD often cannot avoid living in the extreme clutter — especially if they are still minors — which affects their social lives and development. Children are often too embarrassed by all the stuff to have friends come over, or are not allowed to due to their parent's embarrassment. This may lead to feelings of isolation, helplessness, and resentment. In severe cases, children may not have space to play or study to the extent that the parent with hoarding may be investigated by child protective services.
